Excerpt: . . . gious problems that perplex the modern man, and giving the readers an intellectual basis for the reconstruction of their religious life; (c) historical, dealing with the development of the Christian Church, the Reformation, and the rise of the different Protestant denominations and their distinguishing characteristics; (d) sociological, treating social problems from the standpoint of Christianity, and making the position of the Church clear regarding social justice in industry and commerce, and (e) a series of Bible-study handbooks for thoughtful and inquiring adults. Such literature would find great acceptance not only among Polish Protestants, but also among the clergy and laity of the Polish National and the Polish Catholic Churches described above, and among the large number of thoughtful Poles who are at present without any church affiliation; not only among Poles in this country, but also among Poles in the homeland. Protestant policy. --The question of a definite, consistent, and statesmanlike Protestant policy of aggressive religious work among the Poles constitutes the third problem. Whatever Protestant religious work has heretofore been done among the Poles, it has been largely sporadic and haphazard. A local church, conference, or presbytery has here and there become interested in a local group of Poles, and has tried to minister to them after a fashion in its own way. The national denominational boards have cooperated with the local agencies in these enterprises, wherever they have been asked to, and in as far as expediency has permitted. But they have...
