The high unwavering clouds, that had held the sun in unbroken obscurity from its lazy and indulgent rising to its sullen and reluctant setting, were darkening and descending swiftly. When they touched the tops of the sparsely-wooded ridges, the tree-squirrels, warned that their season of provident activity was drawing to a close, dropped their burdens to bark a half-hearted protest, and scampered away to their nests. The querulous jays lowered their crests, cocked their heads on one side for an instant, then fled shrieking to the shelter of the canyon below. There, where a primeval forest of giant redwoods stood rooted in the moss and mold of centuries, the day-long twilight was deepening into dusk, and the solemn stillness was broken only by the...
