Excerpt: .or the gkaid, Masoudi also speaks; he says they extended to the sea about two miles, and even describes the manner in which they were built in it. He supposes that the foundation of these walls, in the depth, was laid through the means of large bags of leather filled with air, which being tied together, the foundation, consisting of a union of stones, iron aiid tin, was prepared and fastened upon them; these bags, being sufficiently loaded, at last, of course sunk down to the bottom of the sea, whereupon the bags, being discharged of the air they contained, the foundation rested upon the solid ground, and so by degrees was raised, until it became level with the surface of the sea.--An account of this we may read in the of Katib-tchelebi, who censures this supposed mode of construction and does not agree...
