The position of the shadow of the riba in the X-ray picture can only be utilized with great caution if at all. Early Tuberculosis in Children and Youthful Individuals. -- Changes in the apices are usually not found, but alterations of the shadow at the hilus, indicating the presence of indurated caseous or calcified bronchial glands, or infiltrative processes in9 the neighborhood of the hilus of the bronchi, is, on the other hand, most important. The author has frequently seen the picture of a central pneumonia due to a mixed infection with pneumococci progressing slowly in spite of the disappearance of the fever, and after weeks being recognized as a tuberculous process by percussion and auscultation and bacteriologic examination. The X-ray examination should be regarded as co-ordinate to physical examination, but it has its limitations. It tells us nothing in regard to the etiology of the process. (See advanced cases of tuberculosis.) (1) The X-ray examination frequently reveals the infiltrative process with a perfection which closely approximates that of the autopsy table. (2) Cavities of every size, from that of a pea upwards, whether superficial or deep-seated, as well as calcified foci, reveal themselves in the X-ray photograph. (3) Sources of error arise from the fact that shadows at different depths in the lungs overlies one another. In many cases infiltrative processes of a non-tuberculous origin (tumors of the lung, bronchiectasis, pulmonary abscess, pulmonary gangrene), can be differentiated. In the main,...
